Report studies Indo-Canadian crime

The rising rate of crime within the Lower Mainland's Indo-Canadian community is being fuelled by a widening generation gap that divides Canadian-born children and their more traditional immigrant parents.

That's one of the findings of a study commissioned by the federal government.

"It's the first study of its kind," researcher Alex Lyakoff told reporters Thursday. "The goal was to shed light on a difficult and complex issue."

"South Asian-based Group Crime in British Columbia: 1993-2003" reports some Indo-Canadian parents are so busy working to improve their lot in life that they have no time for their children, a charge levelled by the Canadian-born children surveyed as well as social workers, police and prosecutors.

Such parents try to make up for their absence by showering their children with possessions, but that makes young people more vulnerable to the lure of crime because their distracted parents know little about their children's activities outside the home, the study indicates. Boys are especially vulnerable because they traditionally get less supervision than girls, several participants said.

"It starts with treating boys differently," said one Indo-Canadian woman.
